ABSTRACT

This bibliography of 62 citations provides information on the latest research and resources on Indochinese students' cultural adjustment, language needs, and educational needs in the United States. Included are teachers' guides, research reports, and other materials on understanding and teaching Indochinese students, Indochinese culture, Indochinese acculturation in American society, language teaching and language learning, bilingual and multicultural education, and programs for the Indochinese. Each entry contains an abstract describing the material and indicates the source from where the document may be obtained. The bibliography was derived from the Bilingual Education Bibliographic Abstracts, a computerized bibliographic file of the National Clearinghouse for Bilingual Education. (MJL)

INTRODUCTION

Understanding Indochinese Students: A Bibliography of Language Maintenance, Cultural Adjustment, and Teachers' Guides is the ninth in a series of topical bibliographies derived from Bilingual Education Bibliographic Abstracts (BEBA), the bibliographic file of the computerized database of the Mational Clearinghouse for Bilingual Education (NCBE). NCBE is an information center operated by InterAmerica Research Associates, Inc?, under a contract from the Office of Bilingual Education and Minority Languages Affairs and the National Institute of Education. The BEBA file, indexed with descriptors from the Thesaurus of ERIC Descriptors and searchable through the Bibliographic Retrieval Services (BRS) search system, is a unique source of information on bilingual education and related topics such as second language instruction, culture, and ethnicity.

This bibliography of over sixty citations was compiled to provide access to the latest research and resources regarding Indochincse students' language and cultural adjustment in U.S. society. Practical titles for teachers and school administrators working with Indochinese students are also included.

The citations in this selected bibliography, which represent only a fraction of the NCBE database's holdings relating to Indochinese students, were retrieved with the following descriptors:

Interference Language Acculturation Cambodians Adjustment (to Environment) Language Loss Hmongs Language Loyalty Biculturalism Indochinese Language Maintenance - Cultural Awareness Laotians Language Patterns Cultural Differences Refugees Language Retention Cultural Pluralism Vietnamese Culture Adjustment Language Shift Vietnamese People Language Transfer Culture Conflict Native Language Maintenance Social Adjustment Retention (of) Language(s) Social Integration Sociocultural Patterns

Each entry contains a thorough abstract describing the contents of the material. Every effort has been made to provide complete information on the availability of each document represented by these entries. For journal articles, this information is to be found in the Source Field, labeled SO in the key on the following page; for most research reports, government reports, and other types of documents, availability is indicated in the field labeled AV. The source journal or the availability address provided, not the Clearinghouse, should be contacted for further information.

AB The large number of Indochinese refugee children entering American schools since the fall of 1975 has made it necessary for local education agencies to try to adjust to these children's language and cultural differences. Recent court decisions regarding language minority students have made clear the schools' obligation to provide access to educational programs and services for such children. This sourcebook is designed to answer some of the questions school staff may have about the legal mandates in general and about Indochinese refugee children and their cultures in particular. Although the book does not attempt to be a complete source, it does cover the following areas: (1) the advantages and disadvantages of the different approaches to second language teaching, (2) ways for non-Indochinese-speaking teachers to communicate with Indochinese children, (3) ESL methodology and criteria for the evaluation of ESL texts, (4) methods for dealing with the shortage of suitable language-specific texts, and (5) the cultural background of these children. A section of sample readings and exercises is included. Appendixes provide information on potential providem areas in English ronunciation and structure. Twenty-one references are cited. (MEO)

ID Thresholds; *Semilingualsm; *Minority Languages

AB This study challenges the Toukamaa and Skutnabb Kangas theory of semilingualism and suggests that an integrated set of sociological and sociolinguistic factors can predict the performance of minority bilinguals in school. Semilingualism is described as a low level of competence in the minority language, a linguistic handicap that prevents the individual from acquiring the linguistic skills appropriate to his original language capacity in any language. Within the framework of a social conflict theory or power, sanctions, and conflict, where there are subordinate and dominant language groups, numerous examples are presented of social class and language-related differences that suggest that existing bilingual education programs neither provide for nor test for ethnolinguistic differences.

Because subordinate immigrant language groups develop contact-dialects and nonstandard varieties of both the native and the dominant language, instruction in the schools could be built around the vernacuiar and allow for gradual transition to scandard versions of either the native or the dominant language. Conventional sociological and sociolinguistic factors that contribute to subordinate language groups' use of the dominant language. Information is needed for: (1) support for the subordinate languages in education; (2) degree of language shift in the subordinate language community; (3) the contrast between the home language code/performance style and that of the school; and (4) ways that teaching and testing can be changed to accommodate subordinate language-group children. A bibliography listing 158 references is language-group children. included. (Author/CCM)

There are five sections to the manual. "Retrospective" covers basically what has happened in the education of refugee children during the 1975-76 school year. "Administrative Consideratious" deals with such continuing problems as grade placement, school records, and testing. "Language Considerations," the largest and most comprehensive section of the manual, covers all phases of language learning needs, with methods, techniques, and materials for oral communication in English receiving the most attention. "Cultural Considerations" discusses the histories and value systems of the peoples of Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos. Appendixes provide bibliographic references and other background information including: (1) additional available documents in the "Indochinese Refugee Education Guides" series; (2) an examination of the educational principles and curricula taught in Vietnam including charts showing the hours of instruction according to grade level and annotated elementary curriculum guides for grades 1-5; (3) a detailed summary of the Vietnamese secondary curriculum outlining the subjects, subject content, and hours of instruction per week for grades 6-12; (4) a selected bibliography of 48 English as a second language (ESL) teaching materials for grades K-12 including ESL structure texts and supplemental texts in reading and writing, pronunciation and conversation vocabulary, and aids for teachers; (5) a 3-part paper providing an annotated bibliography of English language proficiency tests, a bibliography about testing, and 10 principles for test construction and administration; (6) a selected bibliography of 11 monclingual and bilingual dictionaries with 7 publishers' addresses; (7) a selected and annotated bibliography on bilingual bicultural education; (8) a bibliography of bilingual and monolingual Vietnamese, Cambodian, Laotian text materials for grades K-12; (9) i3 bibliographic references on Indochinese cultural topics including Chinese philosophy and Vietnamese, Cambodian, and Lactian history and culture; and (10) an annotated bibliography of 19 documents for grades X-12 concerning Vietnamese history, literature, and folklore. AB This handbook is intended as a guide to the American teacher in helping Vietnamese students make the cultural and academic transition to the American classroom. Part 1 of the handbook suggests approaches to specific problems arising from cultural and linguistic differences, including forms of address, coeducation, work habits, contact with parents, and language of instruction. Part 2 provides more general information about Vietnamese culture, its values and concepts, and Vietnamese attitudes toward education and school. Part 3 contains a glossary of vocabulary items found on Vietnamese high school diplomas and certificates. It is provided to assist in the identification of items on these documents. Part 4 contains a selective bibliography of generally available material's related to Vietnamese culture and language.

ID *Cognitive Academic Language Proficiency; Semilingualism; CALP

AB The existence of a global language proficiency factor is discussed. This factor, cognitive/academic language proficiency (CALP), is directly related to IQ and to other aspects of academic achievement. It accounts for the bulk of reliable variance in a wide variety of language learning measures. Three propositions concerning CALP are reviewed: (1) CALP can be empirically distinguished from interpersonal communicative skills such as accent and fluency in first language (L1) and second language (L2); (2) CALP proficiencies in both Li and L2 are manifestations of the same underlying dimension; (3) because the same dimension underlies CALP in both L1 and L2, older learners, whose proficiency is better developed, will acquire L2 CALP more rapidly than younger learners. The relevance of this analysis for the concepts of semilingualism, code switching, and bilingual education is outlined. Semilingualism is a manifestation of low CALP in both languages. CALP will be less active and effective when the L1 and the L2 are very dissimilar. In the presence of negative affective variables such as low motivation, CALP will not be applied to learning L2. If motivati hal involvement and adoquate exposure to an L1 or L2 exist, CALP will be promoted in both languages regardless of which is the language of instruction. A statistical table is included and 38 bibliographic references are listed. (Author/CCM)

Second Languages; Program Guides ID *Transitional Bilingual Education; *Decision Mcdels; Bilingual Programs AD A sociolinguistic purspective for teaching reading in bilingual programs, begins with an assessment of the bilingual reality of the school community and the community's wishes for attempting to maintain or to change that reality through the bilingual program. Decisions to introduce ceading in the prestige dialect of a non-English tongue, in the local dialect of English or the non-English congue, or in Standard English will affect prereading programs as well as oral second language or dialect programs. Non-English speakers living in a community or language shift to English (transfer communities) will find meaningful participation in the community more difficult than non-English speakers living in a language maintenance community. The bilingual reality in a community is directly related to the need for its members to learn Community members should be involved in assessing the a bilingual reality and in deciding whether that reality should be mirrored in the biliteracy program. A sociolinguistic decision model presents the alternative choices of maintenance or transfer programs for either maintenance or transfer communities. The decision model reflects the hypothesis that the bilingual curriculum may have a strong enough impact to change the bilingual reality within the community. A variety of models are presented which describe alternative routes for articulating oral language development, prereading skills, and introduction to print in bilingual programs. The models presented for transfer communities are delayed reading models; preteading skills being developed in English are extended into the middle of first grade. Prereading skills developed in a native language for maintenance communities should preclude the need for delaying the introduction of the printed word.

If print is to be introduced in a nonstandard dialect, prereading skills must be developed in the dialect, but there is no need to delay the introduction to print. The models present breakdowns for time spent in native language and second language instruction in concept development, written language, and oral language for both English-speaking and non-English-speaking children in grades K-3. Additional models are included for situations in which a nonstandard dialect is also involved. A 16-item glossary and 23 references are included. (SC)

AB If the language resources of the United States are to be conserved, bilingual programs must include measures for the retention of the languages of ethnic minority children even after they have acquired fluency in English. Bilingual programs have lent a new interest in this concept of ethnic language retention (ELRET). Such measures should be taken not only within schools having formal bilingual programs, but in all schools having ethnic speakers, particularly those in which the second languages offered are the ethnic languages of some of their students.

Although much of the second language teaching in the United States is ethnic-oriented, it has for the most part ignored the needs of the ethnic speaker. There are very few materials commercially available for teaching ethnic languages and there is no organized effort or formalized structure within which the teaching of ethnic languages can be planned One means of encouraging language maintenance by ethnic and discussed. speakers would be for high schools and couleges to allow competent ethnic speakers to receive credit on the basis of proficiency examinations; another would be for e ucators to design ethnic language materials and programs which would induce ethnic speakers to stabilize their language proficiency. Because most ethnic speakers have well-developed audiolingual skills, ethnic language retention materials should concentrate on literacy skills. In addition, positive, understanding efforts should be made to sell the community on the concept of retention of the ethnic language. Language teachers must also take a positive attitude toward the ethnic group and its linguistic idiosyncracies in order not to imperil the domains in which the ethnic language is already used, however imperfectly. Another problem is that formalized ethnic language retention efforts and the few commercial publications in this field are almost all directed at Mexican Americans or other Spanish-speaking groups. Italian, which accounted for the largest number of non-English speakers according to the 1960 census, and German, which had the greatest number of speakers as late as 1964 according to one report, are not even represented in bilingual education ELRET activities must reach a wider range of ethnic through a variety of strategies. AB Data derived from the spring 1976 Survey of Income and Education show that over 2 million persons who identified themselves as Chinese, Japanese, Korran, Filipino, or Vietnamese were living in the United States at that time. Of these, the Japanese accounted for 620,000; the Chinese for 578,000; Filipino for 554,000; Korean for 175,000; and Vietnamese for 129,000. Although nearly 75 percent of the Japanese were born in the United States, sizable majorities of each of the other groups were born abroad, including almost all of the Vietnamese and about 80 percent of the Koreans. The proportions of each group living in households in which Asian languages were spoken and/or who usually spoke their mother tongues also varied considerably from group to group. While 90 percent of the Vietnamese lived in households where Vietnamese was spoken and 60 percent usually spoke Vietnamese, only 40 percent of the Japanese living in Japanese-speaking households and 14 percent usually spoke that language. The birthplace of Aisan Americans was closely related to their current language exposure and usage. More than 80 percent of non-Japanese Asian Americans born abroad living in households in which Asian languages were spoken, while only 60 percent of those born in the United States living in such households.

Almost 70 percent of foreign-born Japanese lived in Japanese-speaking in an English-speaking community. Volumes 1-5, 10, and 11 contain curricular materials for beginning English students, volumes 6 and 7 are at the intermediate level, volume 8 teaches pronunciation, and volume 9 focuses on Asian culture. Materials utilize the audiolingual method and feature communication exercises. Components of the beginning-level, 40-lesson curriculum are: (1) a teacher's guide; (2) a teacher's guide for evaluation lessons; (3) Chinese, Vietnamese, and Cambodian supplements; and (4) visuals. Lessons are based on the linguistic and cultural backgrounds of Asian and Hispanic students. The phonological, syntactical, and cultural components of this handbook are intended to provide teachers of Asian students with background information which will help them to understand the problems and needs of their students.

    The handbook focuses on China, Taiwan, Japan, North and South Korea, Samoa, and The Philippines. A brief survey of the pronunciation problems of Samoan students is appended. Thirty-one references are Transitional bilingualism uses the native language as the medium of instruction until students' English skills are developed to the point that English can be used as the sole medium of instruction. These programs are designed to promote language shift and provide no support for the mother tongue. A second type of program is based on monoliterate bilingualism and promotes the development of aural-oral skills in both languages, but literacy skills only in English. The likely outcome of this type of program may be language maintenance in the short run, but language shift in the long run. Programs based on partial bilingualism develop fluency and literacy in both languages, but literacy in the mother tongue is restricted to certain subject matter, often culturally oriented areas such as literature and the arts. Although this type of program encourages both language maintenance and cultural maintenance, it also implies that the non-English mother tongues are not related to control of the technological and economic spheres. A fourth kind of program, based on full bilingualism, involves the use of both languages as media of instruction for all subjects. This type of program, directed at both language maintenance and development of the minority language, results in balanced coordinate bilinguals. Existing or proposed bilingual education programs for Spanish-speaking communities are used to illustrate the operation of each of these program types. Bilingual education in the United States is viewed as academically compensatory for disadvantaged, non-English-speaking, minority group children, but its true contribution to U.S. education should be seen as enrichment for both Anglo and non-Anglo cultural groups.

Ethnographic research is most conducive to the study of processes of cultural transmission and socialization, the content and differences of ethnic cultures, role expectations, or world views. The ethnographer examines the linguistic behavior of children in the context of other cultural variables. In developing profiles of children, ethnographers collect data not only from traditional language, achievement, and intelligence tests, but also from the children's interactions with teachers, peers, and adults in school and at home. Particular problem areas in which ethnographic research can make contributions include the relationship between language skills on the one hand and social participation and achievement on the other; bilingualism and cognitive development; and native language maintenance and academic achievment. Ethnographic research will show that bilingual programs will be successful not because of language instruction but because of the congruence tetween the school environment and the home and community environment (SC) DT 800710 CP Y AN 002981 TI Vietnamese Student and His Community. AB The 16 papers in this collection were presented at the 1978 Annual Asian Forum on Transcultural Adaptation, which focused on Asian students in U.S. classrooms. The goals of the forum were to: (1) provide varied presentations of interest to aid teachers involved with Asian students, (2) share issues and concerns relating to the educational needs of Asian students, and (3) disseminate updated information on curriculum materials that are available and under development. The panels covered four areas of Asian American education: comparative culture, comparative education, desegregation, and bilingual program implementation.

Specific languages and cultures examined include Filipino, Japanese, Hmong, Korean, Chinese, Laotian, and Vietnamese. Also included is a report on the Asian/Pacific American Concerns Committee of the U.S.
   Office of Education. The appendixes contain selected bibliographies,

AB The interlanguage theory suggests that there is a latent psychological structure in the brain which is activated when one attempts to learn a second language. When such an attempt is made, the utterances produced are identical neither to those produced by a native speaker of the target language, nor to meaningful sentences in the learner's native language. Thus a separate linguistic system is hypothesized to account for the actual spoken utterances. Five processes are central to secondlanguage learning: (1) language transfer, (2) transfer of training, (3) learning strategies, (4) communication strategies, and (5) overgeneralization. These processes force fossilizable material upon the surface structures of the learner's interlanguage. Fossilizations

. 3 are s'yntactic forms in the speech of a speaker of a second language that do not conform to the target language noins even after years of instruction. They also include forms which, though absent from a learner's speech under normal conditions, cend to reappear then the subject is forced to deal with difficult material, is in a state of anxiety, or is extremely relaxed. This systematic backsilding of certain linguistic forms toward the interlanguage leads to the hypothesis of the psychological reality of fcssilizations and interlanguages. The goal of a theory of second Language learning would therefore be to describe the knowledge underlying interlingual behavior and to predict the surface structures of the utterances produced in the interlanguage. The educational objectives of the program are that children will: (1) describe similarities and differences in family structure, how families function as the transmitters of learning, and how families serve as the transmitters of cultural heritage; (2) describe the concept or group, give examples of groups to which they belong, and cite reasons for these groups' existences; (3) describe how groups transmit cultural heritage through the recognition of culturally significant day and special persons (Presidents, heroes) and what these people and events mean to each group; and (4) describe how groups transmit cultural heritage through legends and folktales. The ethnic groups addressed in this classroom guide include: American Indians, Mexican Indians, Japanese, Chinese, Vietnamese, Jews, French, Africans, Mexican Americans, and Hawaiians.

Each educational objective is supported by a wide range of art, music, language arts, and audiovisual activities which are sequential in development. Instructional materials to accompany the 239 activities are listed. This paper discusses concerns in educational planning for Asian Americans, and for the Vietnamese in particular. Bilingual bicultural evaluation demands insight, understanding, and acceptance of the individual's cultural background; clinical observation in different settings can bring out data useful in program planning. The process of student evaluation for school placement includes collection of information on family background, health history, and educational experience. All aspects of the child's development are taken into consideration and attempts made to find the best available solution. The most important aspect is to provide flexibility in placement to allow changes if needed. (Author/SI) language retention is reviewed. Within the literature review, the topics of extritudinal and motivational variables and second language achievement, and participation in language-related situations and language and ethnic identity are discussed. Three hypotheses concerning social factors and language retention are examined. A model provided to identify the major aspects of these hypotheses indicates an initial period of second language acquisition which is followed by a period of language incybation during which time no formal training takes place.

   In order to/assess retention, at least two language assessments would be

This paper considers the factors which inhibit or encourage this phenomenon, known as language shift, and examines various typologies that systematize its process and products.

As language shift occurs, both the native language and English are affected. Linguistic borrowing and substitution are accompanied by a trend toward marginal ethnicity and restricted language maintenance, a condition referred to as semilingualism. Interaction with the host society and the urban, industrial nature of the United States encourages a general tendancy toward acculturation; there is a concurrent increase in general personal esteem and use of English. AB The influence of one language upon another during second language acquisition is discussed in a critical review of psychological, linguistic, and developmental theories of bilingualism and language transfer. Two experiments investigated the notion that the requirements imposed or a child with respect to multilingual acquisition may lead to a general linguistic lag compared to a child whose communicative skills are centered on one distinct language. The first study evaluated the effect of native language negative constructions on the production of second-language negative synactic forms. The second experiment investigated the effect of English language acquisition on already existing Spanish language forms with young children from bilingual The results indicate that the developmental character of the bilingual is not significantly influenced by the simultaneous linguistic development of two languages. The implications for early childhood education are discussed. Thirty-six references are cited. (Author/SI)

The results of the French language immersion programs in Canada are reviewed within the context of the native language hypothesis, with the conclusion that earlier theories are simplistic; students who speak the majority language benefit from immersion programs without detriment to the development of first The threshold hypothesis argues that there are levels language skills. of competence in the first and second languages which must be attained in corder to avoid cognitive deficits. The developmental interdependence hypothesis proposes that second language competence is a function of the level of first language competence. It is concluded that the native language hypothesis predicts the academic success of linguistic minority students in dominant language and home language programs, but fails to account for the success of immersion programs with majority language students. Further investigation is needed in the following areas: (1) national language policies, (2) structural relations between linguistic minority and majority groups, (3) the influence of teacher expectations, and (4) the attitudes of children and parents. AB Principles of structural linguistics as they relate to contact-induced language change are applied to an examination of the selectivity of native language influence on second language acquisition. Selectivity refers to formal properties that make second language structures immune or receptive to native language influence, and to second language developmental stages that activate native language transfer along a time axis. It is proposed that the area of a second language potentially susceptible to native language influence can be identified through an examination of that second language's learner-Language.
    Learner-language refers to developmental aspects of the acquisition of a given second language both as a first and as a second language. Basic to this approach is the structuralist assumption that a language will accept only those external influences that correspond to its own structural tendencies and systemic biases. The formal parameters that govern the selectivity of native language transfer, including verb types, questions, and pronomial syntax, are discussed. Forty-three

DE Immigrants; *Refugees; *Indochinese; Asian Americans; Bilingual Education; Acculturation; *Majority Attitudes; *Social Integration; Ethnic Bias; *Educational Needs AB The three major Indochinese groups currently entering the United States are the Vietnamese, Laotians, and Cambodians, all three differing in language, education, and socioeconomic orientation. The large influx of Indochinese refugees has caught many schools by surprise; they are unprepared to receive a large influx of limited-English-speaking students, or deal with hostility toward the Indochinese on the part of teachers and students. Other problems include recruiting qualified bilingual teachers and teacher's &ides, and locating Indochinese curriculum materials in adequate numbers. Whereas many earlier Indochinese immigrants mast, ed English and attained success in business and the community, this second wave of refugees -- larger in number than the first wave -- is in need of guidance and resources that the majority community cannot provide, or will not provide due to increasing hostility toward refugees in general. If the Indochinese continue to perceive education as a means of attaining economic security, they will be successful in adapting to life in the United States. However, those who do become acculturated through the educational system will increasingly come into conflict with the more traditional members of their ethnic group. DE *Refugees; *Communication (Thought Transfer); Acculturation; Culture Conflict; *Vietnamese People; Asian Americans; Social Integration; Ethnic Relations; *Adjustment (To Environment); *Cultural Interrelationships AB Factors affecting the cross-cultural adjustment of Vietnamese refugees in the United States are discussed. Government programs to facilitate the resettlement process/have emphasized language and job training but have not addressed acculturation. While the majority of Vietnamese refugees have been economically successful, communication between the refugees and their host/communities has presented problems. The effects of Vietnamese tradition's on communicative behavior; of cultural background on societal transactions; and of psychoreligious forces on way of life, thought, and expression are described. The Vietnamese communicative style is influenced by an inherent distrust of strangers, inwardness, subtlety, indirectness, and emphasis of tact over frankness. These attributes can be easily misinterpreted by Americans as dishonesty, while American straightforwardness can be viewed by the Vietnamese as rude and unintelligent. Research on refugee/host cross-cultural communication is recommended. Three references and a list of 18 recommended readings are appended. (RW) DT 810814

DE *Academic Achievement; *Student Adjustment; *Social Adjustment; *Indochinese; Asian Americans; *Refugees; *Acculturation; Secondary AB The adaptation of Indochinese refugee students to their new schools in the United States was explored. Ninety-six Indochinese refugee students in junior high and senior high school, most in their fourth year of enrollment, were administered questionnaires on demographic characteristics, attitudes toward the school setting, and perceived academic ability and performance. Age, perceived adaptation in the old school, and academic standing in the old school were found to be factors in new school adjustment. Perceived adaptation and academic standing in the old school correlated positively with perceived adaptation and academic standing in the new school, whereas age varied inversely with these two dependent variables. It is concluded that adjustment to the school setting can accelerate acculturation, which in turn improves academic performance. Three references are appended. (RW) DT 810717 CP Y

AB Research on the cultural and social implications of language diversity is reviewed with implications for language policy, specifically policy directed at immigrants and refugees. Decades of linguistic research argue against the view that teaching immigrants and refugees to speak English entails merely providing them with a new way to articulate the same thoughts they once conveyed in their native tongue. The research on cultural factors of linguistic differences has indicated that languages are unique reflectors of speakers' traditions and modes of thinking. More recent investigations have added the social implications of language diversity to the cultural factors, with the conclusion that language incorporates not only the world views of its speakers, but also their conceptions of their social standing. It can also be demonstrated that language plays a key role in determining the quality of intergroup relations between major communities. Three policy directions emerge from studies on language and identity: (1) policymakers must understand that the close tie between language and identity makes language education an emotional issue, (2) the transition from one language to another must be a gradual process for refugees and immigrants, and (3) refugees must be viewed as people who need to learn a new language while utilizing their native linguistic skills. DE *English (Second Language); *English For Special Purposes; Second Language Instruction; *Refugees; *Immigrants; Language Maintenance; *Indochinese; Asian Americans; Educational Policy; *Teaching Methods; Notional Functional Syllabi; Daily Living Skills AB U.S. language policy toward refugees is reviewed, emphasizing the experience of teaching Indochinese refugees in English as a second language (ESL). Assimilation by immigrants to the new society, while not a legal requirement, was a moral expectation established in the colonial and early post-colonial eras. Later the public education system, through its night school classes, became the major purveyor of American values and English. The wave of Indochinese refugees arriving in the United States in 1975 greatly influenced both U.S. legislation and language teaching. Since traditional ESL approaches proved unsatisfactory, a new approach, English for special purposes (ESP), began to be employed. The English language curricula now being formulated for refugees and the text materials being developed build upon the work in ESP, namely notional functional and adult learning theory. Two major differences between ESP and the new curricula are the emphasis on oral skills for survival and employment and the basing of language curricula on real life tasks. While the passage of the 1980 refugee act (PL 96-212) marks a historic moment in refugee history, there remain many political and linguistic questions for the immigrant and the refugee. These include the issue of native language and cultural maintenance and the problems of teaching the nonliterate.

AB Some hints are provided for U.S. teachers who must deal with culturally different Indochinese students in their classrooms. Many of the Indochinese educational attitudes can be ascribed to Confucianist thought. For example, education in Indochina stresses respect for the teacher and emphasis on book and rote learning methods. Since Indochinese students are only beginning to learn English, the teacher should enunciate clearly and talk slowly. The teacher must refrain from using gestures that convey different messages in America and Indochina and be aware of Indochinese speech patterns. The teacher should also recognize that traditionally Indochinese students hold their teacher in awe and are thus likely to be shy in classroom settings. Because Indochinese working habits are different from those of American students, a teacher should gradually introduce extensive readings, library use, and participation in class discussions. Since classes are segregated by sex in Indochina, special care must be exercised when introducing coeducation and physical and sex education. A recommended reading list is included. (JRA)
